Background ===== Chronic lymphocytic leukemia (CLL) is characterized by the progressive accumulation of phenotypically and functionally altered B-lymphocytes in the bone marrow, blood, and lymphoid organs. Various treatments are currently available for patients with CLL, such as chemotherapy, or targeted therapy. Despite the development of new drugs, CLL remains a heterogeneous disease with a survival from more than 5 to 5 years, depending on the presence of prognostic factors at diagnosis \[@B1],[@B2]\]. In addition, some patients are not eligible for treatment and are monitored only. The outcome of these patients is still unknown. In this context, predictive markers of response to therapy or disease progression are needed. Determining the reason for an early progression of CLL can help physicians to decide whether continuing to treat or monitoring. Methods ===== Here we propose an integrative analysis of gene expression datasets to identify differentially expressed genes between mutated and unmutated immunoglobulin heavy chain variable regions
